George Frideric Handel's "Messiah" premiered in Dublin in April 1742 and has since been performed in churches and concert halls worldwide, eventually becoming a popular Christmas tradition.

A timeless Baroque oratorio, the work has become synonymous with the festive spirit of peace and love, and an apt piece to be performed at this month's two annual Benefit Concerts organized by the Japan International Volunteer Center (JVC).

The JVC Benefit Concerts, which have been organized since 1989, are being held for the 20th time at Izumi Hall in Osaka on Dec. 7, and for the 25th time at Showa Women's University's Hitomi Memorial Hall in Tokyo on Dec. 14.

Proceeds from the ticket sales will be donated to support the numerous JVC projects, which help support victims of war-torn nations, as well as those of natural and nuclear disasters in Japan.

Songs for Christmas: The 2012 Japan International Volunteer Center Benefit Concert in Osaka entertains a captivated audience with George Frideric Handel's "Messiah."

JVC is an international nongovernmental organization that has been providing livelihood assistance for people in need since it was established in 1980. Its most recent activities have focused on nine countries in Africa and Asia, including Cambodia, Afghanistan and South Africa.

Tickets cost from ¥3,000 to ¥10,000. A ¥4,000 ticket will enable a child-care volunteer in South Africa, which has one of the highest number of HIV and AIDS cases in Africa, to undertake five-day training. A ¥5,000 ticket can train two Cambodian families on how to improve the yield of rice, while a ¥10,000-ticket can provide a lecture

Suffocating on osechi, Japan's selective traditional New Year's dishes, re does happen. Which is why Osaka-based food manufacturer Fukunao Medical Foods Co. is holding an event on Dec. 7 where osechi cuisine specially prepared for people with chewing problem and dysphagia will be available for tasting.

Osechi often includes grilled sea bream kamaboko (broiled fish cake) and tazukuri (dried sardines cooked in soy sauce and sugar). But with Japan's rapidly aging society, it's come to light that some of these dishes are troublesome for those with difficulty chewing and swallowing. Every year, there are reports of the elderly who have choked while trying to swallow mochi (sticky rice cakes), a popular part of the New Year's meal.

Fukunao is revolutionizing the tradition meal by creating what it's calling "yawaraka" (soft) osechi. Some of their
